Blowing the Whistle on Military Accidents

After Vietnam War, more than 15,000 members of the U.S. armed forces have died in mishaps. Many of these could have been prevented if our military leaders would have listen to and incorporated safety procedures that have been learned from past investigations. Too often cover-ups happen from bungled investigations, looking for a scapegoat to explain and often blaming the victims at getting a quick answer and moving on. Most of the time the results would be classified keeping from solving the true issues in improving safety. Upper management in the military is slow to except change and truly make changes in safety procedures to address a true fix.

Dr Alan Diehl having a degree in Psychology looked at the human factors especially in the aviation fields, aircrew training, and accident investigation procurers in this book explains having observed the system from the inside reveals some of the military's most unsettling secrets.
